Ageing Cultures, Ageing Concepts

Ageing relations are often understood at the intersection of other forms of othering: through the sociology of cohorts, through debates about ageism and ableism or as a specialty topic of those studying care. But what if we started noticing age as an inherent part of all relations? What new viewpoints might arise when we recognize that everything is always already ageing in time, while also understanding that this process is biological, culturally constructed, and relational? Suddenly, it is no longer just the person with wrinkles, but also a young activist, a depopulated village or a belief in a radiant future that might be said to »not have aged well.«

This conference brings to light the norms and relations that become critical when people, things and ideas come to be seen as aged. It asks scholars, activists, children and artists how ageing occurs in different cultural contexts, and how this complicates overall societal relations and their ideological conundrums. What can we learn from queer, feminist theory and disability studies? How can new concepts shift our view of ageing in relation to one another? How are such concepts themselves subverted by their advancing age? What changing figures and tropes of ageing do we find in literature, film and art? And finally: How can social theory be reconfigured without a middle-aged adult as its ideal actor?
